I am thinking of writing a novel with this novel(first novel in English) as a starting point, but that is another story. However, if it were, then what exactly would be the point? I mean, this book is not a coherent narrative. As said in the previous post, despite the fact that I finished the book before, and in fact, even before the actual printing, I am really happy to have it as an ebook format. Because it is something that I really didn't expect before. That's why I was really surprised to find the version of this book available as an ebook. So, if I were to start, then I'd say the introduction is the prologue. Within the first few pages, we're introduced to the book's main characters, and we're told the story of how the two ends up meeting, as well as the main plot. However, there are also hints that we're going to see more of the other characters later on. As for the main plot, there is going to be some degree of emphasis on the suffering of the main character, and her depression, as well as her loss. The introduction is very short, but I think it's enough to introduce the novel in a coherent manner. I've also noticed something interesting about the prologue. This is a novel that comes from the perspective of two characters who are best friends, but it's still described from the viewpoint of a third, interlocutor who is a doctor. So, even though the main story and plot follows the relationship between two characters, there is also a third person narrative that interacts with the main narrative. For example, the narration may be at times disjointed, and may include some flashback events. In other words, it is a very emotional and deep novel, and I think it may be one of the best 82157476af
